

Change I'll make: Add an email CTA to the end of the Work page, not just Home and About/Contact.

Why: My own sitemap's arrow label says the hiring manager is "convinced, wants to connect" right after finishing a case study on Work — that's the peak-conviction moment. But right now there's no CTA there. They'd have to navigate away to act on that impulse, and that's exactly the point where I could lose them — distracted, tab closed, moved on to the next candidate.

Why this over the other two flags (undefined "featured work preview," no page for the One Honest Line): Those are real but softer — one's a scope question, one's a content-placement question. Neither breaks the funnel if left alone. Missing a contact path at the moment of highest conviction does. If someone likes my work and can't immediately act on it, the opportunity is just gone.